Droga5 / Accenture Song
New York, NY

Dear Droga5 Production Team,

The first film that made me fall in love with storytelling was The Five Heartbeats by Robert Townsend. As a kid, I was so fascinated by how music was woven into that narrative that I'd quote the movie endlessly and occasionally get in trouble with my parents for the language. What I was really doing, though, was trying to understand something I couldn't articulate yet: how music inside a story doesn't just accompany what's happening. It tells you what to feel before you have time to think about it. As a Black woman and creative professional, I have carried that lesson into everything I've done since. It is what music supervision does. And it is exactly what the best advertising does too.

The reason I want to do this work specifically at Droga5 is that your campaigns operate at that same level, music and image and idea arriving together in a way that bypasses the rational and goes straight to the emotional. That requires someone who doesn't just know music, but who thinks about why a specific track works for a specific moment, and who can defend that instinct in a room with a creative director and a brand team and come out with the right answer.

My path to this role has been deliberate. At Position Music, I built and categorized 10-20 DISCO playlists against creative briefs every week, learning to hear a track not just as music but as a sync decision -- what does this do emotionally, where does it breathe, how does it land against picture. I tagged catalog tracks with keywords and genre metadata to enhance trailer sync potential, which forced me to think about a song's utility beyond its surface sound. I verified 50-60 NBC Sports cue sheet entries per cycle, which taught me the accuracy and detail discipline that rights tracking requires. And as music supervisor on a 10-episode documentary podcast filmed in Ghana, I made real creative decisions under real budget and clearance constraints, coordinating directly with international rights holders from start to finish.

My graduate coursework at Carnegie Mellon in Music Supervision, Intellectual Property, and TV Business and Legal Affairs gave me the structural knowledge underneath that hands-on experience -- how rights flow, how clearance works, how to research a rights holder and develop a ballpark estimate. I also completed a full script breakdown of My Best Friend's Wedding and produced supervised edits with spotting notes, all of which are documented at jhussie.github.io/portfolio/Droga5MusicSupervisor.

I am early in my career and I know it. What I am bringing is a genuine, deep, specific relationship with music and how it works inside visual media, the technical foundation to do the rights and clearance work accurately, and the hunger to be in this room, learning from people who are doing this at the highest level. I would be grateful for the opportunity.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Warmly,
Jabreneé Hussie
